SECTION A: Extracts from a Story

All That's Gold may not Glitter (Part One)

Trash, garbage, gash, refuse, litter, waste, junk, rubbish – it's everywhere. Yet, what one person throws away as useless, broken or unwanted can make another person's day, year or life. I am old now and rubbish has always been my life.

"Come on, Lou, we'll miss the good stuff – get up, please!" nagged Lou Xiaoying's best and only friend. Despite being the older, Li looked up to Lou because she always found the richest pickings. He and Lou were a team – a rubbish team. They had worked the rubbish since they could crawl. When both Lou Xiaoying's and Li Zin's parents were sent to work on the government farms, Lou's grandmother took them in and taught them to make a living out of rubbish before she died.

Every day, they scrabbled through the piles of garbage littering the streets of Jinhua, a poor remote city in China's eastern Zhejiang province. They recycled or sold anything they could find – leather, scrap metal, plastic – anything that could fetch a few coins.

"Are you dreaming again?" teased Li.

"You laugh but it will happen – I have the dream every night. My grandmother warns me to be ready because one day I will find a treasure beyond value but only if I recognize it."

"I'd recognize it in a flash! A fat wallet maybe packed with Yuan, or a bag of glittering gold – plenty to let us get a proper place to live and enough to eat!"

1. Comprehension: Answer the following questions in full sentences and in your own words as far as possible.

All That's Gold may not Glitter (Part Two)

For more than 45 years, Lou and Li worked the rubbish as a team and every day Lou worried that she would not be ready. When Lou and Li got married, they had a daughter who joined them.

"Do you still dream, Lou?" asked Li one day as they turned into the street behind the main square.

"Always," replied Lou sadly. "My dream is as strong as ever but perhaps I believe it less – maybe it was more a child's hope than something to believe. And yet I still feel that I am missing something – something I have to do."

Li hugged her tight. Then Lou caught something familiar nestled in a pile of fluttering litter. She reached down and her trembling fingers touched something soft – not warm, not cold. It squiggled ever so slightly.

"Li, look! It's a baby – a tiny baby all alone, thrown away like a piece of worthless junk!"

Lou and Li had no idea what to do with this tiny scrap of life but they knew for sure that Lou would never have her dream again.

3.1 When Li asked his wife if she still dreamed her usual dream, she answered, "Always" but with sadness in her voice. Why was she sad? (1)

3.2 What did Lou find in the litter that particular day? (1)

4.3 How do you know that the words in bold form a clause and not a phrase? (1)

4.4 What type of subordinate clause is it? (1)

SECTION B: Factual Article found on the Internet

It was the luckiest day for more than 30 Chinese babies when they were found by Lou Xiaoying. Lou has spent her life scratching a living from recycling rubbish from the streets of Jinhau, in the eastern Zhejiang province. She and her husband, Li, have taken in and found homes for the babies she found abandoned. She has raised four of them herself, including her youngest, Zhang, now aged 7, whom she found in a dustbin when she was already 82 years old.

"Even though I was already getting old, I could not simply ignore the baby and leave him to die in the trash. He looked so sweet and so needy. I had to take him home with me. He is now a thriving little boy, who is happy and healthy.

My older children help look after Zhang and he is special to all of us. I named him after the Chinese word for rare and precious.

The whole thing started when I found the first baby, a little girl back in 1972, when I was out collecting rubbish. She was just lying amongst the junk on the street, abandoned. She would have died had we not rescued and taken her in. I realized if we had strength enough to collect garbage, how could we not recycle something as important as human lives."

1. Answer these questions in full sentences.

1.1 How does it make you feel that some people have to make a living out of rubbish? Explain your answer. (2)
1.2 How does it make you feel that babies are sometimes abandoned? Explain. (2)
1.3 What makes Lou a remarkable woman? Name two different reasons. (2)
1.4 Why were so many babies abandoned in China? Think of what you have learned in Geography. (1)

2. True or false. Substantiate each answer with a short quote from the article. (8)

2.1 Zhang was found on a rubbish heap in the street.
2.2 Lou and Li kept all the abandoned babies that they found.
2.3 Lou lived in Jinhau which is found in the province of Zhejiang.
2.4 Zhang's name means rare or precious in Japanese.
2.5 The first baby Lou found was a little boy.
